PREFACE

Among the various unique institutions of the British government, one deserving greater attention than it has hitherto received is the Royal Commission. Not only is it an institution of respectable antiquity, even among British political instrumentalities, and not only is it coming to be employed with increasing frequency as the decades roll by, but it is also particularly important as a device whereby the regular, persisting governmental organism taps the surrounding substance of impartial, informed opinion in the body politic, and gains the guidance and strength which continued attempt at self-sufficiency could never give. Investigators, especially those in the social sciences, have become familiar with many of the reports made by Royal Commissions, or at least with citations therefrom, such as the Commission on Labor in 1890-94; the series relating to British agriculture; those on Indian currency and finance of 1913 and 1925; or that on Local Government of 1923-25. And manifold have been the administrative and institutional changes in the British government that have flowed from the recommendations of these extraordinary committees.

The purpose of this introduction, however, is not to trace the history of Royal Commissions or to attempt an adequate evaluation of their influence upon British policies or legal development. Its aim is much more modest, being merely that of description. It seeks to answer only such questions as: What is a Royal Commission? How does a body of this name come into existence? What is its typical composition? What are the immediate products of its deliberations?¹

While the nature of a Royal Commission, as well as its name, has varied from time to time since the first one was instituted (in 1386, according to one authority²), the Royal Commission of modern decades may be defined as a body appointed by the Crown and composed predominantly of civilians (i.e., persons not holding office under the existing government) who have knowledge of or even interest in the subject or subjects of inquiry—which body is instructed to investigate a problem or series of related problems and report its findings and recommendations to the Crown. But such a definition, like others that attempt to cover a broad genus of items, must have explanations at various points.

Royal Commissions are created by the Crown, sometimes at its own discretion and sometimes on the advice or demand of one or both houses of the legislature. It is independent of all regular departments of the government, except for the fiscal control of the Treasury—although it may, and usually does, call upon divers governmental officers or departments for information; and it reports to the Crown only.

² Cox, op. cit., p. 155. In the earlier decades of the nineteenth century, bodies similar in character were called "Commissions of Inquiry."

The occasion for the appointment of a Royal Commission is ordinarily the rise of some major controversy or problem the solution of which is not comprehended by established administrative practice or recognized public policy. A particular social disturbance, even a general strike, would not typically provoke the creation of a commission of this sort, nor a controversy or problem which had been the issue in a general election. A crisis in national affairs, political or economic, on the other hand, or the development of new social needs may well call forth an inquiry by such a commission, as also legislative proposals involving fundamental changes in the common law, or new schemes of education or of the regulation of public morals.

Less frequently the impartial investigation of an outside, civilian body is desired by the Crown with respect to alleged abuses or defects in the administration of a government department, especially a department engaged in the maintenance of "the King's peace"; and the judgment of a Royal Commission is invoked. Several times, too, such commissions have been set up to examine the administration and public policies in overseas possessions—with peculiar usefulness, since by the testimony adduced at the Commission's hearings the residents of a dominion or colony gain an opportunity to be heard in England itself, almost by Parliament, before legislation is passed affecting them.³

Varying with the nature of the task to which it is set, the Commission may be a small body of special experts or a large body representative of the main interests concerned, including the most general or public interest. The number of members ranges from three to over thirty, but representative commissions run from ten to twenty members.

Important to the operation of a commission is the statement of its task in the royal warrant creating it—the so-called "terms of reference." The scope of its inquiries and its attitude are determined thereby. The problem is set forth in these "terms," and rarely does a commission wander further afield. Viscount Lee of Fareham, chairman of the Royal Commission on Police Powers and Procedure, suggested the difficulties of Royal Commissions in this regard in his opening statement at the first public session of the Commission just mentioned.

We appeal to all parties interested to help us to reach our goal within a reasonable time and, in particular, to remember that we are unable to deal with any matter, however interesting or important, which does not come within our

³ The Departmental Committee of 1910, referred to above, of which Lord Balfour was chairman, defined by implication the most fruitful field or fields for the operation of Royal Commissions when it reported, "We are unanimous in believing that the appointment of Royal Commissions is useful for the elucidation of difficult subjects which are attracting public attention but in regard to which information is not sufficiently accurate to form a preliminary to legislation" (Report, p. 6).

Terms of Reference. That is a point which I have, from a good deal of experience in the past, felt it necessary to emphasize throughout my remarks, because I have found that Commissions are invariably bombarded by enthusiastic persons who have pet schemes to push, and who are disgusted if the Commission will not disregard its sailing orders and allow them to direct it over uncharted seas. On this point we must be adamant, and views or representations, however admirable, which do not come within the Terms of Reference, must seek opportunities for ventilation on some other occasion and before some other tribunal.⁴

In pursuing its aim, the proceedings of a commission are quasi-judicial in character. Witnesses are selected and invited to appear or otherwise present testimony; evidence founded on first-hand knowledge is especially sought after; and questions may be propounded to witnesses by members of the Royal body. Testimony may be taken in public or in private, and may be oral or written. Most commonly the meetings are public and the great bulk of the evidence oral. Where technical information or advice is essential, a Royal Commission may appoint subcommittees to secure the appropriate data, engage experts, and pay them out of public funds.⁵

After the evidence and necessary technical information have been secured, the commissioners deliberate among themselves, discuss the conclusions to which testimony leads, and draw up their report. In case of a division of opinion, reports may be presented by a majority and a minority—sometimes by individual dissenting members. The report or reports, with the minutes of evidence, are submitted to the Crown—and the Commission adjourns sine die.

Typically, then, Royal Commissions are primarily advisory and possessed of no executive or administrative authority. They are constituted in large measure of expert or at least informed civilians. They devote themselves to a semi-judicial exploration of the problems raised and outlined by their respective terms of reference. And they remain in existence only until their last report is issued.

To all the foregoing, however, certain objections may be raised: there are Royal Commissions which in one or more important features differ strikingly from the characterization above presented. A few such commissions persist over periods of years—one has been in existence since 1887. Some have semi-executive functions, as, for example, the Royal Commission on Historical Manuscripts; and some have semi-judicial powers, as, for instance, the Royal Commission on Awards to Inventors. By accident or in response to some particular need, the ordinary orbit of Royal Commissions has been enlarged or altered.

In presenting the following tabulation of the reports of Royal Commissions over the past seventy-five years, therefore, data are given with respect to one of the peculiar but most valuable institutions of British political organization. Nothing quite like it exists elsewhere in the world, and no other government has an equally potent instrument for impartial, expert inquiry on broad, public questions. The

British Royal Commission has its roots, to be sure, in the distant past, but its coming into flower in the nineteenth century may be attributed perhaps to the coincidence in the England of that period, of high intellectual attainments, of the spirit of social service, and of a notable instinct for government in the dominant social and politically powerful upper classes.

Moreover, it is hoped that this tabulation will aid in making readily available that important source of data upon political, economic, and social conditions in England and the British Empire, namely, the Minutes of Evidence published by most of the Royal Commissions. Usually the reports drafted by such commissions have influence ultimately if not at once, indirectly if not directly, in the shaping of legislation; but whether such influence becomes real or not, the information collected at, or in connection with, their hearings and reproduced in the volumes of evidence remain as invaluable sources of data for all subsequent students in the various fields of research. Moreover, reference to these volumes of evidence is the more valuable at the present time, since, in the past decade, the practice has become rather general of omitting from the regular set of Parliamentary Papers the Minutes of Evidence collected by Royal Commissions. These volumes are published separately, but must be sought for individually by libraries or interested students.

Funds for the collection of information regarding the publications of Royal Commissions were provided by the Harvard University Committee on Research in the Social Sciences. I am also grateful to the Committee for funds whereby the publication of this pamphlet was made possible. My attention to the need of this investigation was first drawn by Professor W. Y. Elliott. The assembly of the data has been wholly in the hands of Mr. B. L. Gabiné.

LIST OF ROYAL COMMISSION REPORTS

Compiled by Mr. B. L. Gabiné.

Notes. In the following tabulation, certain abbreviations and omissions have been made that need explanation:

The date following the title of each Commission is the date of original appointment. In some cases, commissions were reappointed, but no attempt has been made to indicate such later dates.

Unless specifically indicated in a footnote, the documents listed herein were published by H. M. Stationery Office.

The phrase "Published separately" has been utilized to indicate that certain documents have not been included in the regular set of Parliamentary Papers and given enumeration in that series. Such documents, however, were published by H. M. Stationery Office.

The terms "Cd." and "Minutes of Evidence" have been used throughout, although terminology in the original documents has been variant. With respect to the former terms, it may be added as an aid in accurate citations that the abbreviation "C." was employed prior to 1900, that of "Cd." in the years 1900 through 1918, and that of "Cmd." in more recent years.

The references to Parliamentary Papers carried at the right in smaller type have been reduced in number to the minimum necessary for clarity. Such a reference appearing after the citation of two or more documents will be understood to relate to the whole group subsequent to the preceding reference. Thus, "1893, [Cd. 892-92iii]" will be interpreted to cover the four documents cited immediately above. A similar practice has been followed with respect to cases where several documents listed seriatim have not been included in the regular set of Parliamentary Papers. The phrase "Published separately" appearing at the end of such a series should be understood to mean that none of the documents up to the preceding reference has been included in the regular Parliamentary Paper series.
